

The Princess and the Pea

Once upon a time, a prince was searching for a true princess to marry. He traveled far and wide, meeting many beautiful princesses, but none of them seemed to be quite the right one. One stormy night, a young woman arrived at the palace, claiming to be a princess. The queen, wanting to test the girl's claim, decided to conduct a special test.

The queen placed a single pea under twenty mattresses and invited the girl to sleep in the royal bed. In the morning, the girl appeared tired and complained of a restless night. "I couldn't sleep at all," she said, "because something hard was poking me."

The queen smiled knowingly. The princess's sensitivity to the pea proved that she was indeed a true princess, as only someone of royal blood would have such delicate sensitivity.

The princess and the prince were married, and they lived happily ever after.

The moral of story : True royalty is not just about appearances or wealth ; it is also about inner qualities such as sensitivity and grace.
